Amendment of Part II of the Commission's rules regarding the Emergency Alert System
PS Docket Number 15-94

Regarding the inclusion of Blue Alerts in the alert table of the Emergency Alert System (EAS) I see it as something that is not necessary at this time. I feel that while it has good intentions, it sets a bad precedent with many possible unfavorable consequences.

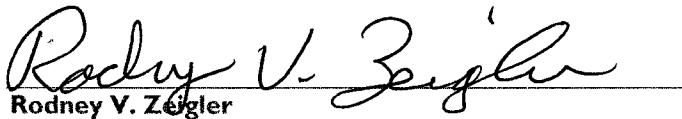

AMBER alerts were conceived almost 20 years ago in response to a perceived need to alert the public to children in danger, and it has done a good job in recovering these children and apprehending their captors. AMBER alerts are NOT in the EAS alert table, yet AMBER alerting works well.

Silver alerts are being used in many jurisdictions to request assistance from the public for recovery of older citizens who are lost. Again, Silver alerts are not in the EAS alert table, but rather a non-EAS public alerting category.

Blue alerts, like the two previously mentioned alerts need not be in the EAS alert table to be effective. They can be used by the media to categorize an alert, or they could be used as a headline in an EAS or WEA alert using one of the existing EAS alert categories. By making Blue alerts part of the EAS alert table it opens the door to other "Color" alerts being created until we have added any number of special interest alerts, as has been discussed in various EAS forums. Another item to consider in "Color" alerting will be the public confusion and eventual dismissal associated with the plethora of alerts that are sure to happen once "Color" has been added to the EAS alert table.

To be perfectly clear, I am not against alerting to aid law enforcement and other first responders. I am a former volunteer Assistant Fire Chief and Fire Investigator, My wife is a former EMT and EMT Training Officer. Our oldest son is a former EMT who worked in less than safe districts in an urban environment. Another son is currently a Police Detective, another son is a Sheriff's Deputy, our daughter is a Dispatch Supervisor for law enforcement and first responders, and our son-in-law is a Corrections Officer. Public service runs wide and deep in our family. I am currently the Chairman of the Nebraska State Emergency Communications Committee and the Executive Director of the National Emergency Broadcast Association (the PEP station organization).

Thank you for considering my comment on Docket 15-94.
